Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Armageddon A poem without a publisher is like a boat without the water. Each may have graceful lines, and be painted in pleasing colors, but they refuse to carry their builder to the haven where he would be; and the sea of literature is much like the briny deep, for on both are calms and storms, reefs and bars, and many books as well as boats find their haven at the first ebbing tide. All of my literary boats are on land, except a few, and they are fast in the mud; those few were launched about a year ago, but they had unskillful pilots, tattered sails, and before they left the little bay by which I dwell the wind died out, so they drifted on the quicksands of that estuary called oblivion. This book may have a like fate; however, it is figuratively built and launched by my own arm; that is, I wrote it, set the type, and gathered together enough money to have it bound. I have no favors to ask, and no regrets to write; and while it does not appear that champagne was spilled on its sides, or that admirers cheered as it first kissed its element, it glitters in the ripples of my little home, and like the boy who carefully pushes his unpiloted play boat from the shore, so will I give my book one push, and say adieu.
