Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: . liver does not act as it should the zest of life departs, and the saying that life and living depend on the liver, although somewhat facetious, contains more than a modicum of truth. An engorged liver, of course, signifies that the organ requires active stimulation, especially when the condition is attended by manifestations of auto-toxemia. If any one fact has been more definitely established than another it is that such stimulation should not be brought about by the use of drastic cathartics, for if so, the remedy is frequently worse than the disease in its sinister effects. What is particularly needed is a means of stimulation which will satis factorily increase the functional activity of the liver, without setting up catharsis or over activity of the bowels. The above needs are well met by Chionia, Chionanthus Virginica. This well-known product exerts a distinctly specific action on the liver and is probably one of the most efficient remedies at our command to stimulate the hepatic functions. Administered in regular and appropriate dosage it increases the flow of bile, relieves congestion of the biliary passages, promotes digestion, and although it sleanses the intestinal canal it accomplishes this without purging or griping.--Adv. The Rational Treatment of Atonic Dyspepsia. Glandular inactivity or laziness Is probably the chief cause of the various manifestations of dyspepsia and indigestion. In the stomach this commcn disorder causes the usual symptoms of pain, fermentation and distress, which it is not necessary to discuss, and...
