The agreement, let us say, calls for the sharing of profits or losses equally, and the payment of a salary of two hundred and fifty dollars a month to each. Mr. Brown is to have sole charge of the sales and buying activities, and Mr. Smith of the financial, accounting and office activities, including all purchases other than hats. The opening entries would differ only in these respects: the memorandum in the journal would be more complete, setting forth the essential details of the copartnership agreement as just outlined. There would be two cash book entries for the investments, one crediting Albert Brown with five thousand dollars, the other crediting George Smith s capital account with the same amount. Suppose that instead...
