The long mirrors, the foot-rails and the swinging doors passed from the State to return no more. Meanwhile the agitation for national prohibition had grown, culminating a few years later in the submission of the constitutional amendment outlawing the traffic in this country. That the experience of Birmingham under prohibition had a marked effect in bringing about the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment, undoubtedly is true. As that fight raged inquiries poured into this city from all parts of the country, and frequently visitors came to see for themselves how a large industrial community managed to get along without suds and swinging doors. And what these inquirers found furnished little encouragement to the wet forces, for this city thrived amazingly under arid conditions. Here, too, was found a visible and really remarkable illustration of the effect of sobriety--a huge and imposing building that had been transformed from a prison into a parental school. This jail, erected during the days of the saloon, was designed to care for three hundred prisoners. Built of steel and concrete, and looking not unlike an ancient castle, this building was designed for permanency. No one dreamed that the number of prisoners ever could become so reduced that it would not be needed. Yet this happened. Arrests fell off so rapidly following the abolishment of the saloon, that the old jail, which had become entirely too small while liquor flowed, was ample under the changed...
