Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .prohibit the satisfactory examination of these latter. A complete census of the soil minerals can scarcely be said to be advisable for practical work. On account of the large number of minerals to be located and determined a large amount of time is unnecessarily wasted. It is generally best to determine only the more abundant species and a few of the rarer ones belonging to distinct mineral groups. Unless ultimate work is desired, it is unnecessary to differentiate such groups as, for example, the chlorites. In conclusion, it may be stated that any mineral commonly occurring in rocks may be expected in soils, no matter what the origin of the particular soil may be. A large number of soils have now been examined in this laboratory as well as in other laboratories, mainly abroad, and the results have been or are to be published in other connections, so that it does not seem wise to recapitulate them here. Work is now in progress with the distinct end in view to determine the extent of the mineral complexity of the more prominent American soil types, and it is expected that the results will be collected and published for the use of other investigators at an early date. To aid in the rapid identification of soil minerals, Tables IX, X, XI, and XII (96 et seq.) have been added in which the minerals are arranged primarily according to the classification adopted in the foregoing description, and secondarily according...
